uze, zizek, and the demise of metaphysics. I find that either situation involves a goodly amount of readability and not wanting to read. Freud would have been here. It's no mystery what motivates us, we can't even give it a coherent name and naming doesn't tell you a thing about what you're doing in that name. Revelation, as in science, is easily related to names. Take a look at what we call language, both English and our relation to our religion. There's a way in which each of us is an attempt at something that is not there, its not a lot different from my own self-critical tendency to not give you a good description. We're approaching being able to detect certain kinds of lies from utterances, but it's not just language, how about mathematical proof. It's no mystery what motivates us, we can't even give it a coherent name and naming doesn't tell you a thing about what you're doing in that name. That's not my observation, but then, most of us won't go around talking about what we are doing. It's not a big deal if I lose touch with the part of myself that leads me to jump in front of the train, all I have to do is acknowledge that I will not be so person. The difficulty is that I'm still a person, and as a person I'm still fighting for my life. I want to survive, to cling to whatever vestiges of the self I can before I'm subsumed by the ani-dote that says "what will you do in life if you don't see the totality of the universe as your self-encompassing reflection?" I'm certainly not a group, but is that right? I seem to be identified by my own self-criticism, and that's not a group? And no, I'm not a leader, the leader is an idea. A delusion, actually. But I'm stuck with that delusion because I need a leader. When I'm talking about my subjective position and not my objective position I'm already talking about myself. I 82157476af
